The Ambush

On the evening of the 9 January 1867 four special detectives were ambushed and murdered at Duck Pond – Jinden, situated 62 kilometers south of Braidwood.

They were searching for the notorious Clarke Gang, which are considered the bloodiest bushrangers in Australian history.

To this day the murders represent the largest single mass murder of police in Australian history (Ned Kelly murdered three), it also represents the largest reward (£5,000) offered by a single Australian Government in history.

The lawlessness of the gang also resulted in the instigation of the Felons Apprehension Act of 1865 to include provision for members of the public to capture and/or kill members of the Gang on sight.

They were the "victims of some extraordinary treachery" and the post mortem revealed some shocking signs. The body of Carroll had a £1 note placed on it as a symbol.

The limits of the Country in those times

The early days of the colony Jinden was at its far limits of lawlessness. Settlers, ex convicts and migrants swelled as the end of transportation in 1840 diluted the system.

The gold rush was about to hit the area and inflame the problem and see the rise of the Clarke Gang.

Duck Pond – Jinden

The actual site of the ambush remains pretty much as it was 150 years ago. The only noticeable difference is where a very large Manna Gum tree once stood that was capable of hiding three or four men and the placement of two large stones for the Jinden Police Memorial placed on site this year.

The special police were travelling east to west (left to right) towards the Jinden Homestead on the evening of the 9th.

Funeral procession of the Special Police

There was much interest around Australia at the time for their plight as depicted in this drawing from a Melbourne newspaper at the time.

The great bell at St Bede's Church at Braidwood Tolled at 1030am, the procession from the Court House to the Cemetery down Wallace street commenced with Sergeant Duffy and Smith escorting, whilst Superintendent Orridge lead the remainder of the 150 persons.

THE CAPTURE OF THE CLARKES.

(FROM THE SYDNEY MORNING HERALD.) A correspondent sends the following further particulars :--

"BRAIDWOOD, APRIL 29.

"From an early hour on Sunday many were anxiously looking for the culprits to enter the town ; some more anxious than others took to their horses, and galloped out to meet the escort in charge of the two men who had put the district in such dread for a length of time. The excitement was intense when the police were seen coming into town. Johnny Clarke appeared care-worn and extremely pale, possibly from the fact of losing a great deal of blood from the gunshot-wound in his left shoulder. Tommy, on the contrary, appeared to consider that the number who were waiting to get a glimpse of him was a mark of respect to him, and treated it as a hero would on a triumphal march into a city after some great exploit of He recognised one or two of his valour. former associates by an inclination of the When he had reached as far as the head. 1867 – Memorial to the Jinden Four

A four sided monument was later constructed within the Catholic section of the Braidwood Cemetery. Each side bearing the names of the special police and "...murdered at Jinden on 9th January 1867, whilst in pursuit of the outlaw, Thomas Clarke".

The men were originally buried at Jinden under sheets of bark without coffins. After a public outcry they were exhumed and taken to Braidwood.

On the 140th anniversary Commissioner Ken Moroney AO, APM erected a commemorative plaque at its base.

The four Special Police are also remembered at the National Police Memorial – Kings Park, Canberra for their sacrifice and dedication to duty and the preservation of the rule of law in the early days of the colony of New South Wales.
